Dinner for Two

ROLLO RACCOON and his dear friend, Billy Beaver, lay comfortably in the shade of a spreading oak tree and talked of the wonders of the world. It was morning, and while all the animals of the forest were busily gathering food for the day, they lolled in the tall, green grass.

"It is such a shame that clever animals like ourselves should be born to work," said Rollo Raccoon as he yawned.

"You're so right, friend," agreed Billy Beaver. "It's okay for the others to slave over their grocery list, but few deserve the better things in life, Rollo, old chum."

They looked at each other appreciatively and nodded their heads. From where they sat they had an excellent view of the path. They watched Hoppy Squirrel dash past them with a bag filled with nice, brown nuts; and Kayo Rabbit hop by with a paper sack of ripe carrots over his shoulder; and finally Snoopy Fox wave a nice fat hen at them and hurry away.

"Common laborers," said Rollo Raccoon disdainfully.

At noontime the sun was directly above them and Rollo Raccoon and Billy Beaver felt the first pangs of hunger. Most of the choice foods had been gathered that morning by the other animals. Now they were faced with the problem of scouting around for themselves.

"I have a splendid idea," said Rollo Raccoon. "I have an idea that'll supply us with enough food for days—and we won't have to dirty our hands the tiniest bit."

"If it doesn't involve too much work, I'm all for it," said Billy Beaver stretching his legs and turning over on his side. "What is it?"

"You and I will put on a fight and all the animals will have to bring a package of food in order to get in to see the fine exhibition. We can spar around for a while and pretend that we are really angry, but we won't hurt each other."

"An ingenious idea," exclaimed Billy Beaver. "And maybe, if all goes well, we can demand a return bout with each other and fool them into coming again!"

"Splendid!" cried Rollo Raccoon. "But what we need is a lot of publicity. Now we'll split up for a few hours and feign anger. We'll each tell everyone we meet that the other is an awful fighter and couldn't hit a flea. But remember to sound fighting mad to attract more of an audience!"

The two friends shook hands and parted.

Raccoon went around to the homes of all the animals in the forest shouting that Billy Beaver was an awful fighter and couldn't hit a flea—and meanwhile, Billy Beaver made the rounds of the forest too, telling everyone that. Rollo Raccoon was an awful fighter and couldn't hit a flea. They stirred up a good deal of excitement and a few animals even asked where they could buy tickets.

That night Rollo Raccoon and Billy Beaver met under the spreading oak tree where the fight was to take place. They were both very hungry by this time, but they smiled in anticipation of the food that would soon be theirs. They sparred a little for practice but really didn't lay a paw on each other. They even growled at each other, but it sounded more like a smothered giggle.

"If we decide to make a career of boxing," said Billy Beaver when they had stopped to rest, "maybe we'd better hire a manager and agent. This might be too big for us to handle."

"You might be right, dear friend," said his companion thoughtfully. "But that would mean dividing the spoils. The more food for us the better, I think."

The forest shadows grew longer as night slowly descended, but no one had arrived to see the fight. They sat down on the grass and hopefully listened for footsteps but all remained still.

"You did say seven o'clock, didn't you, friend?" asked Rollo Raccoon.

"Oh, yes," he assured him. "Seven prompt. I said."

At nine o'clock that night they continued to wait expectantly, and finally they heard the rustling of leaves. Snoopy Fox passed by without noticing either of them.

"Wait, Snoopy," cried Billy Beaver. "Aren't you coming to the fight?"

"Heavens no," Snoopy snickered. "No one is."

"But why not," they asked together.

"Well, we all figured it this way: if you, Rollo Raccoon, are an awful fighter and couldn't hit a flea, and you, Billy Beaver, are an awful fighter and couldn't hit a flea, why should we waste our time watching two awful fighters who couldn't hit fleas?"

Rollo Raccoon and Billy Beaver pledged a solemn oath to meet early the next morning under the spreading oak tree. They wanted to make doubly sure that they had enough time to gather food to fill the horrible empty pit in their stomachs!
